Harry's favorite subject in school is music. He has music classes on Monday and Friday. He loves them. At home, he likes playing the guitar and singing, too. "You're going to be a great singer one day," his music teacher often tells him.

One day Harry's music teacher told him about a music competition. "In September there's going to be a very important competition with a big prize," she said. Harry was really interested. "I think you should sing in the competition," she told him. "But first you are going to need a lot of practice," she said. "Come to school early every morning and we can practice your songs before the other students arrive."

The next week Harry had to wake up at 6:00 every morning and leave the house at 6:30 to walk to school. He practiced singing with his music teacher, but he was really tired. Harry didn't like getting up early! And it was a lot of work. "Can you repeat that song, Harry?" she asked again and again.

At the competition he sang very well. But when he won the second prize, he was sad. "You said I'm going to be a great singer, but I didn't win," he told his teacher. "Harry, you did very well, but if you want to be a great singer, you have to work harder than all the other singers in the world," she said.
